The Caltrap Staff met Monday, September tenth. Ladies Searlaith, Marie Chantal and Annys discussed the notes for the preparation of the Valor Court reports and some of the devices in preparation for submission. The next Caltrap Staff meeting will be held Monday, October 15. We have tentatively scheduled the November Staff meeting for Monday, November 28. From the Minister of Arts

Unto the populace of Vatavia comes this letter from Lady Saerlaith, Minister of Arts

Well! We got Valor over with, and hopefully we all recovered. Our Arts and Sciences competition was a success. I was pleased to see entries from 11 citizens of Vatavia, and 3 winners out of 8 categories represented. Only one was an

-7-

"Art", but I'm proud of all of you who entered anyway. Let's keep on a roll and enter the Baronial Arts and Sciences Championship in November. The date and other details should have been announced at September's populace meeting. If you have any questions, call me.

I've got extra copies of the judging criteria if you want to find out what is required on the entries.

Some of our intersset group meetings have been suffering a lack of attendance the past month or two. Hopefully, as things settle down for the winter, we will have more time and energy to get together. Remember there are some interest groups that will need new meeting places for the winter (in the Arts, the one that comes to mind first is Dance-if we can work through the winter, we can really wow them at the Shakespeare's Birthady Party).

Until next month,

Lady Searlaith

From the New Minister of Sciences

Hail Unto All the Scientific Types of Vatavia,

From the Archer Marshall

Greetings Unto Ye,

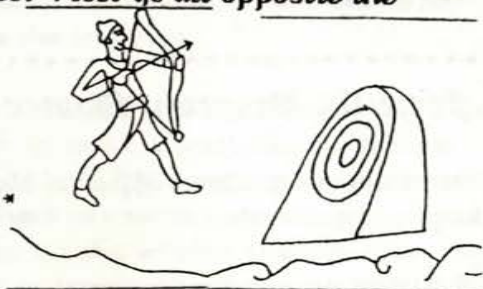

Archers are in high spirits at gatherings far and wide as we have won prizes and admiration. A muster is being formed for a very special tournament for missile weapons at Three Rivers, (St. Louis, MO) in October the 5-7. If wishing to join in please speak forth with thy Luchistnik Balroc or myself. Also seeking archers to assist at KC Renfair please fore warn me as I have for thee strategies. Meet ye all opposite the target.

Thanks,

Stephen of Firefall

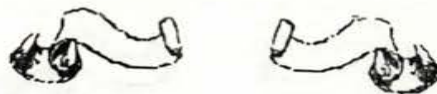

From the Chronicler

Greetings to One and All,

I am now finally on the right track with the Dragonflyre especially because its almost ready to go to print and its not even populace yet. We are now sticking to our arrows on deadlines. I will still be happy to accept anything you may wish to give me at populace, but it won't be printed until the following month. For those persons who have given me things to print and they have not appeared as yet. Well I to must go through the process of Baronial approval. Your stuff has gotten caught up in the black hole of politics. It is just now reappearing so if you have any further problem please take it up with the Baronage or the Seneschal. I have given them your most welcomed comments on the matter. Please do not feel your submissions were unwelcomed I still hope to print a few more things when once again they find their way home.

As you can tell I am also reprinting various articles from the past. Being that most of us are new to this Barony old news is new news. The Dragonflyre files have been recently updated as much as possible. I hope to print a list of the missing Flyres and any one wishing to donate their copy to the file would be greatly appreciated. I am hoping by printing some of the old stuff to spur on a little creativity from our new people. As well as let everyone know how really lucky we are to have some of our senior members and their numerous talents to help keep us inspired.

In Service to Vatavia and Calontir,
Lady Gwendolynn Morna O'Shaughnessey

Who's Who In Vatavia

(reprint from Nov. AS XIX)

I am Lawrence Taillefer the Leech, 3rd son of a French merchant and landholder of the county of Champagne. My father left his holdings there to avoid the heavy taxes of Phillip Augustus in 1182 (some say-at their peril-it was to avoid service in his crusade against the Albigenses.) In any event he sold his holdings and fled across the Rhine to assume better control of the holdings of his wife, my mother in the Duchy of Franconia. He became a Master of Copper works in Frankfurt and set up a comfortable life for himself and his family.

My brothers fared well in their seniority as my eldest holds heirship to my fathers holdings and place in the crasthall and my older brother is an assistant to the Cardinal of Cologne. ("a good priest" it is said of him)

As for me, I enjoyed the fruit of irresponsibility, for much of my youth was spent avoiding training in my father's craft, and running free through the streets of Frankfurt. It was after one bloody, football game that my father saw fit to enlist me into the service of a noble...ah....a military life for me....

My lord was a fair man and entrusted my training in the arts of war to a hardfisted soldier named Claus the Deformed (from a careless habit of his youth in blocking a dagger with his left hand-you can well imagine the effect). The man knew the trade of soldiery well and taught me all he knew, and with all the strife of lord against lord in the absence of King Frederick II (1220-1250 of the Hohenstaufen line), I was war hardened at sixteen.

My lot fell to be in the service of Cardinal at Castle Dracensfeld in 1217 just prior to the seige of the Rhine stronghold and there I became acquainted to the surgeon of the Keep. I showed some promise at tending battle wounds, and he taught me what he could of his craft and magic. The castel fell six years later, as the north wall collapsed due to the work of Sappers, and our force surrendered. Fortunately, the Pope's Truce of God prevented our deaths, and I was freed to wander the Germanic lands, selling my skills as healer and swordsman where I would.

My sword swung in many a fight over what seemed like less ground than a man could stand on as Lord sought to displace Lord. If Frederick II had returned from southern Italy many nobles would band together to enforce their rights of holding. He was much acursed for his efforts to wrest control of these fiefs from the nobles and place them in his complete control. I heard much talk of mercenaries massing under his banner in the Kingdom of the Sicilies for just this purpose, but nothing much came from these rumors. (The mantel of the Holy Roman Emperor does much to increase a kings thoughts of himself) It would seem that he had enough to concern himself with in Sicily to worry with lands of the North. (and its half-breeds)

I traveled a great deal finally setting in V'tavia where in view of the fairness of the land it's people, I will reside awhile.

The Legend of Arthur by Ed. Thomas Bacon (from the June XVI A.S.)

It is though the legend of King Arthur that most people first become acquainted with the Middle Ages. Since he burst upon the literary scene in the 12th century, King Arthur has been the most popular and enduring figure in popular folklore, rivaled only by the heroes of Homer's epic poems. Even today new tellings of his story appear regularly.

The historical Arthur is hidden by mists of the past. In the few records that survived, there are only brief mentions of him by name, and one other passage that could be applied to him. And that is all. All else is legend.

The fifth century was a perilous time in Britain. The Roman legions that had protected her had made their last appearance on the Island in 418. Hope of their return remained until 446, but to no avail. Meanwhile, Vortigern, a native taking over from the Romans, had invited some Saxons from Germany to help him fight the Scots and Picts, who were coming down from the north. But the two Saxon leaders, Hengest and Horsa, turned on Vortigern, and thus began the Saxon invasions, at a date usually recorded as 455.

The earliest account of what occurs next is given by the monk Gildas in about 540. While he wrote his treatise, "De Excidio et Conquesta Britanniae," mainly to deplore the wickedness of the current kings, he did give a brief account of the recent history. In it he mentions that resistance to the Saxons was organized by Ambrosius Aurelianus, a Roman descendent, which ended victoriously with the battle of Mons Badonicus, or Badon Hill. Bede, who relied primarily on Gildas, dates the battle as 493 in his "A History of the English Church and People."

The next account of the period was written in 858 by the monk Nennius. In his "History of the Britons," he lists 12 battles that Arthur fought against the Saxons, with the final victory occurring at Mount Badon. The only other mentions of Arthur occur in the "Annales Cambriae," which puts the battle of Badon in 518 and notes that in the battle of Camlann in 539, Arthur and Medraut died. The mists of time reveal no more.

The battle of Badon is important in that it stopped the Saxon advance. There was an outflow of Saxons during the next four decades and even the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" says very little of this period. This respite ended in 552, and soon after, the island belonged to the Saxons.

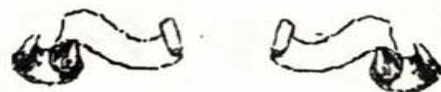

The legend of Arthur begins in 1136 with the publication of Geoffrey of Monmouth's "The History of the Kings of Britain."

It is here that we meet for the first time many of the now familiar details of the legend. Geoffrey wrote his book as a history, and even as late as 1620 was considered an authority.

Much of his book, however, is more fanciful than factual as several contemporary historians have pointed out.

Nevertheless, its popularity was immediate.

The sources of Geoffrey's work are unknown. The basic outline of the book is from Nennius, but little else. In his dedication, Geoffrey mentions having received a book in the British language, but most historians doubt its existence. To say that he made it all up is dangerous, as a number of details have been found to be true. But for all its faults as history, it is a major piece of literature. Here we meet Merlin for the first time, as he gives a long prophecy to Vortigern as revealed by the fight between a red and a white dragon. The scene comes from Nennius, but in his work the prophecy was made by a Ambrosius, who would become the father of Aurelius Ambrosius. Geoffrey makes Aurelius the son of Constantine 11, a real Roman general (c. 407), successor to Vortigern, and bother of Uther Pendragon, a name out of Celtic poems. Geoffrey also recounts the seduction of Igerna by Uther, including his shape change by Merlin. And here we learn of Arthur's end by the treachery of Mordred and his departure to the Isle of Avalon, which Geoffrey claims to have occurred in 542.

While Geoffrey is the source of the basic Arthurian legend, it is not in the form with which we are familiar. Lancelot is not here, instead Arthur's champion is Gawain, a Celtic hero that had long been connected to Arthur in the Celtic legends of Wales. It is Modred with whom Guinevere runs off. Arthur's sword is named Caliburn, forged on the island of Avalon. But all the changes that would come later, the basic story and theme had been set.

The first to expand upon Geoffrey was Robert Wace in 1155. In a 15,000 line poem, the concept of Arthur's court as the Medieval ideal comes to the fore. It is he who introduces the Round Table.

He is followed by Chretien de Troyes, one of the most famous troubadours of the Middle Ages. It is Chretien who conceived of Lancelot, Galahad, and the Grail. Lancelot first appeared in the poem "Eric" as the chief knight in Arthur's court. In "Chevalier de la Chartte," Lancelot came to the forefront and became Guinevere's lover. Galahad made an appearance as the son of Lancelot and Elaine, the daughter of King Pallas. In the "Conte del Gra l," Chretien introduced the Grail theme, with Percival as the hero. Chretien did not finish "Conte del Graal," and so various endings were composed by several writers, the most notable being Wolfram von Eschenbach.

In the following centuries, many romances were written with an Arthurian theme. A set of prose stories by Robert de Boron, known as the Vulgate cycle, is the nucleus around which the last major changes were made in the Arthurian legend. The sword in the anvil, the Morgain la Fee became a major character and was rendered as source of opposition. The stage was set for Sir Thomas Malory.

The person of Thomas Malory is as mysterious as the historical Arthur. All that is known of him is the colophon that William Caxton printed in the first edition of 1485. Whoever he was, Malory has become the touchstone for all later writers of Arthur. In his book, "Morte d'Arthur," he achieved both a summation and a unification of all the romances and legends that surrounded Arthur. It is Malory who placed Camelot in that semi-mythical Golden Age that the name now evokes. It is an achievement that has few equals.

With Malory we have the Arthur legend in its final form. Since his time many writers have penned their own interpretations of the story: Tennyson, T.H. White, and Steinbeck the most prominent. Milton was about to write his own version before deciding to write "Paradise Lost." Even today, 500 years after "Morte d'Arthur," Arthur's appeal has not diminished and his story is told in books, plays, movies, comics, and other diverse forms of communication. The legend ends with Arthur being carried to Avalon where he lives until England's time of need. During the Middle Ages there was much argument as to the location of Avalon and whether Arthur still lived. But if Avalon is where our dreams and hope lie, then it is true that King Arthur is alive and well today.
